In a non-volatile memory device, programming must be performed in a high voltage while erasing must be performed in a low voltage. Moreover, in reading, a voltage of a word line connected to a memory cell selected in reading must be set to a level capable of fixing an output level of a selected sense amplifier. A typical non-volatile memory device includes a programmable read-only memory (PROM) and a flash memory, which are non-volatile memory devices having the same structure as that of the flash memory. However, the flash memory has a memory cell matrix structure in which a memory cell array is divided into block units, and each block has a plurality of memory cells and a plurality of sense amplifiers.

Accordingly, in writing, the write voltage must be set to the level of each memory cell matrix for the purpose of erasing and programming. In reading, word lines which belong to the same block as the sense amplifier connected to the selected memory cell must be set to the level of the memory cell matrix. Therefore, in a typical flash memory, word lines are formed separately from a memory cell array, and the word lines connected to memory cells corresponding to the selected sense amplifier are connected to the sense amplifier. Meanwhile, in a ROM (read-only memory) such as the PROM, a gate insulating film is formed over an entire surface of a semiconductor substrate. Memory cells are provided on the gate insulating film, and control gates of these memory cells are connected to a word line formed on the word line. Accordingly, when the word line is set to the level of the memory cell matrix, the word line becomes capable of operating as the word line in the ROM. The ROM having the above-mentioned structure is generally produced in a two-dimensional cell layout form in which memory cells are provided over a semiconductor substrate in parallel in the direction of the word line. Accordingly, a page mode is used in reading in which data can be read out from memory cells connected to the same word line. However, when a flash
